

During these challenging and unprecedented times, The David J. Joseph Company is closely monitoring the Coronavirus Disease 2019 (COVID-19) pandemic as it develops. There is no doubt that this is a rapidly changing situation that could have significant ramifications, but DJJ is working hard to minimize supply chain disruptions. DJJ is in daily communication with its suppliers and logistics providers throughout North America and globally, to be sure DJJ stays apprised of the most current information and can quickly adjust to changes. DJJ's large national footprint is an important asset in this situation and we will work to leverage it for the benefit of our business partners.

The safety and well-being of everyone in the DJJ community, including our customers and suppliers, is of vital importance and certainly top of mind right now. With regard to questions about the health status of DJJ's suppliers, customers, transportation and other vendors, DJJ will be happy to pass along health questionnaires and ask its business partners to respond to the best of their ability based on the available information. Safety is DJJ's number one core value.

During periods of uncertainty such as this one, questions sometimes outweigh answers, and we know that makes business operations stressful. We cannot take away uncertainty, but we are committed to communicating clearly and notifying our suppliers and customers of potential issues as quickly as practical. DJJ's online platform ScrapConnect is accessible to all DJJ's trading partners so they can obtain accurate updated information at the touch of button. Integrity has always been a part of the DJJ value system, and its principles of transparency and accountability have and will continue to make DJJ the leading scrap broker in the United States.
